During his appearance, the president of the Government of Spain stressed that "Spain is stronger than it was five years ago", but "there is still a lot to do" and the new progressive coalition government "has more desire, determination and enthusiasm than ever". Sanchez stressed that the new Government "will have a strong feminist accent with four female vice-presidents and more female ministers than male ministers". Furthermore, he explained that "it will have continuity in economic affairs and in the so-called state ministries" and "he will prioritize social policies and more specifically housing and policies dedicated to young people."

On the other hand, the head of the Spanish Executive has pointed out that the new Government will introduce "new priorities", with the "creation of new ministries such as the Ministry of Housing and Urban Agenda, the Ministry of Digital Transformation or the Ministry of Youth and Children. And it will prioritize dialogue and negotiation in a legislature that will be key for Spain's social and territorial cohesion".

A high-profile political team

Pedro Sanchez also wanted to stress that Spain are at the beginning of "a legislature with a high political profile" and for this "we must have a team that is up to the task, a team with a high political profile. A solvent and solid Government to offer security in a country and in a world, shaken by great transformations and challenges." Likewise, the Spanish President highlighted the preparation and competence of all the members of the new Executive, as well as their backgrounds, many of them forged in regional and local politics.

Sanchez wanted to say a few words of thanks to the men and women who will no longer form part of the Government, to whom he expressed his "recognition and gratitude for the great work they have done." In this regard, he recalled that they have been ministers who have faced unprecedented situations, such as the Covid pandemic or the war in Ukraine and its humanitarian, political and socio-economic consequences.
